

The Mission of the Avielle Foundation is to prevent violence and build compassion through neuroscience research, community engagement, and education. The Foundation will do so by directing resources to support:

1. Breakthrough neuroscience research, bridging behavioral and biochemical sciences, and making the neurosciences a prestigious and lucrative life endeavor.
2. Community engagement and education initiatives that empower youth, parents, teachers, health care providers, and law enforcement – the everyday citizen – to advocate for brain health in themselves and others.

Avielle Rose Richman was one of twenty-six children and educators tragically killed at Sandy Hook Elementary School in Newtown, CT on December 14th, 2012. Avielle's parents, Jennifer and Jeremy, are infinitely heart broken, and like so many of you, want to bring about changes to stop a tragedy such as this from happening to any community — ever again.

The Avielle Foundation has been created to honor their loving daughter — along with all the others who have fallen victim to violence — by truly understanding what leads someone to engage in such harmful behavior as suicide or homicide. We're working closely with world leaders in two vital areas: Brain health research and community building.

Objective #1: Research – Making the Invisible Visible

Brain science is the least explored of all our sciences. As a result there is shame, fear, and stigma associated with the invisible diseases of the brain and people often fail to advocate for themselves or their loved ones when it comes to “mental” illnesses. The fact is, the brain is just another organ and we need to move away from this invisible world of diagnosis based on symptoms and syndromes and toward a visible world of diagnosis based on measureable pathologies. It is the belief of the Avielle Foundation we must understand the biological and environmental risk factors that impact the brain, leading to violence to self or others, and the protective factors that engender compassion and connection. This will give people hope for themselves and their loved ones. It will eliminate the fear of a label, and the idea that there is a character flaw in themselves or their loved ones. Once a deeper understanding has been established, we can apply these insights to educate the everyday citizen about how to identify the signs and symptoms of someone in or nearing a brain health crises and how to responsibly advocate for those at risk of violent behaviors. We must take action to ensure what happened to Avielle does not happen again – we must stop our epidemic of violence. Ultimately, this will be done by making the invisible visible.

Objective #2: Education – Knowledge is Power and Empowering

Jennifer and Jeremy instilled an open-minded, open-hearted philosophy in Avielle because they know a strong community is one where every member belongs and is a valuable contributor —regardless of ethnicity, beliefs, political views, lifestyle, economics, or social ideologies. In such communities, individuals don't feel ostracized, stigmatized, bullied, or alienated, and the propensity to act in desperate, destructive, or violent ways is diminished or eliminated. We are helping to build communities where all individuals are included, given a contributing role, and kept safe. Most importantly we are educating ourselves and others with our brain health findings in order to dispel fears of seeking help and to facilitate rational and effective treatment interventions. With the proper brain health knowledge and tools, we can develop and put into practice innovative programs to facilitate appropriate preventative and interventional strategies such as counseling, education, and novel therapeutics that result in connection and compassion. We feel that knowledge is not just power, it is empowering.

Scope:

The Avielle Foundation was incorporated in January, 2013 and was approved as a tax-exempt nonprofit 501(C)3 in June, 2013. We seek to prevent violence and build empathy with a two-pronged approach:

- Facilitating novel brain health research, education, and policy;
- Fostering community engagement, education, and responsibility.

With these efforts we hope to: Remove the fear and trepidation that bar people seeking brain health aid; develop the concept of a standard “brain health check-up”; identify behavioral and biochemical diagnostics for early detection of individuals at-risk of violent behaviors and facilitate their responsible use; provide conduits to effective treatments; and strengthen communities, kindness, compassion, and respect.

Funding for the planned objectives is being procured through private donations, non-profit matching funds from corporations, corporate donations, and grant solicitation. Grass-roots fundraising and organizational development were the focus of the first 12 months of the Foundation and is on-going at this time in conjunction with the active solicitation of funds from potential individual donors and interested entities, as well as community-based fundraisers. The focus of this third year has been on planning for dissemination of resources to support brain research and community education programs. The Foundation has been providing a variety of educational lectures, focused on the science of violence and compassion, to parent groups, health care providers, community and Congressional leaders, high school students, teachers, universities, veterans, law enforcement, and other first responders.

The Avielle Foundation Board and Founders have been actively meeting with experts in brain health, leaders in public health and education, policy makers, and community organizers. These include Nobel laureate Dr. Paul Greengard; Head of the Department of Psychiatry at Yale, Dr John Krystal; Secretary of Education; Secretary of Health and Human Services; brain researchers at the world’s premier research institutions, including the UCSF Sandler Neuroscience Center; President Obama and Vice-president Biden; numerous Senators and members of the House of Representatives; numerous psychiatrists, clinical psychologists, neurologists, neuroscientists, pediatricians, therapists, and social workers. The goal of these meetings has been to gain a deeper understanding of what is known and what is not known in the brain health fields, how to remove the fear and trepidation associated with brain illnesses, and how to most effectively prevent violence through brain research initiatives and community education.

Bringing together this financial support and brain health advocacy, the Avielle Foundation has developed a research fellowship and grant selection process for fund distribution. Potential funding recipients are identified and invited to apply based upon past experience and demonstration of excellence. Awardees are chosen in one of three areas:

1. Novel research, focused on understanding the behavioral and biochemical mechanisms of violence, empathy, and compassion.
2. Strengthening brain health education
3. Strengthening and developing public health strategies focused on building compassion and preventing violence.

Many of the world’s leaders in the neurosciences, psychiatry, clinical psychology, neurology, and social work have agreed to serve on a selection committee to review and prioritize potential research fellow recipients of the Avielle Foundation funding and grants.

The Avielle Foundation funding of community education, engagement, and responsibility will take on a number of potential forms. These include providing educational lectures and discussions, supporting community centers and other public meeting areas, fostering education groups, Pre-K through grade 12 programs, and community service grants. The goal of the community efforts is to empower youth, parents, teachers, healthcare providers, and law enforcement to advocate for brain health in themselves and others and to foster education and connectivity.
